

5 QUESTIONS TO ASK BEFORE ANY BIG FINANCIAL DECISION

The numbers are rarely the hardest part

What am I actually deciding — and what am I avoiding deciding?

What does the math say — and why doesn't it feel like enough?

When I imagine looking back on this decisions, what do I want to be true?

Who else does this decision affect — and have I been honest about that?

What would need to be true for me to feel fully confident in this choice?

Financial decisions are also life decisions. These questions help you see both.

What am I actually deciding — and what am I avoiding deciding?

Most big decisions have a surface question and a real question underneath it. "Should I buy this house?" might really be "Am I ready to commit to this life?" Getting honest about the real question is where clarity begins.

What I've been telling myself the decision is:

What the decision underneath that one might actually be:

What does the math say — and why doesn't it feel like enough?

If you've run the numbers and still don't feel settled, the math isn't the problem. A fear, a values conflict, a belief about what you deserve — that something else is part of the decision. It deserves to be named, not pushed aside.

What the numbers say I should do:

What's making it feel more complicated than that:

When I imagine looking back on this decisions, what do I want to be true?

The clearest way to cut through the noise of a big decision is to get out of the present moment and into your future self's perspective. From there, the fear usually gets quieter and the values get louder.

When I look back on this decision, I want to feel:

The choice that gets me closer to that feeling is:

Who else does this decision affect — and have I been honest about that?

Big financial decisions rarely happen in isolation. This question isn't about getting permission, it's about making sure you're deciding with the full picture, not just your slice of it.

Who else is affected by this decision:

What I've been assuming about how they feel vs. what I actually know:

What would need to be true for me to feel fully confident in this choice?

This is the most important question — because it makes you define what confidence actually looks like for you. Sometimes it reveals a piece of information you need. Sometimes it reveals you already have what you need to decide. Either way, you're no longer stuck.

I would feel confident about this decision if:

The one thing I can do this week to get closer to that:
